Frank Romano : Desktop Follies before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Desktop Follies:

A collection of one-liners, jokes and other material related to computers, desktop publishing and the foibles of a technological age.

"Frank Romano is a combination of Nostradamus and Henny Youngman for the printing industry, and this book is vintage Frank. On top of that he is a noted practitioner and teacher, who is reported to have invented the typo, and he has cleverly scattered examples throughout the book as a training exercise. I heartily recommend it as fun-filled, mind-expanding experience." (Larry Warter, director of new business development for Fuji \ Photo Film U.S.A., Inc.), -- Larry Warter, director of new business development for Fuji/Photo Film U.S.A., Inc. Frank Romano has been entertaining readers since before I was born. I heard him in the womb. -- Richard Romano, MicroPublishing News Frank Romano has published the "Frank Talk" column for over 20 years with his view of the world of technology. Today's readers will find his observations just as funny and pointed as ever. -- Gene Gable, Seybold Publications Frank may not have invented printing, but he did invent the typo, samples of which he has liberally sprinkled throughout "Desktop Follies." We guarantee you will open this book to any page and laugh. -- Digital Printing Report From the Back Cover In 1977 Frank Romano founded TypeWorld, a twice-monthly newspaper dedicated to typographic communication. A continuing column called "Frank Talk" was filled with comments, one-liners, poor poetry, and general observations. Over the years readers have asked for this material to be collected and destroyed. Well, it's too late. It is all in this book. About the Author Frank Romano is a professor at the Rochester Institute of Technology and the author of 33 books, mostly on printing and related technology. Many are listed on .com. He founded 7 magazines including the 23-year old Electronic Publishing.
